Justification for counting this course towards the CLAS BA

This course tasks students with making observations - using online observatory resources - and subsequently analyzing these observations using appropriate scientific methods learned in ASTR 191 (which is a pre- or co-requisite for this course). The students will critically evaluate the scientific theories purported to explain the astrophysical phenomena they will observe. A key part of this final process is a correct identification of the uncertainty associated with their observations (and the theory) and understanding of how this uncertainty impacts their conclusions (i.e., what they can conclude).

How does this course meet the CLAS BA requirements?

Lab and Field Experiences (LFE)

Will this course be required for a degree, major, minor, certificate, or concentration?

No

Rationale for Course Proposal The advent of online content (online observatories, e.g.) now enables us to offer an appropriate laboratory course to complement our contemporary astronomy course (ASTR 191). We believe that this new laboratory course will provide students a wonderful opportunity to experience and engage in contemporary astronomy research using state-of-the-art resources.

Note: Consult the major advisor during pre-enrollment advising each semester. Prospective majors should consult the department as early as possible. The department may require a student to take and pass a preparatory course not already taken before enrolling for a given elective. The department has guidelines for substitutions at all levels, premajor and major. Each substitution must be approved.

Fieldwork

Field experience is a junior/senior option for majors. Fieldwork may be done anywhere in the U.S. or abroad. Careful arrangements must be made long in advance. Consult the department a full semester before enrollment.

Double Majors

African and African-American studies majors are encouraged to take a second major in a related or compatible field. Because the major is interdisciplinary, a second major is relatively easy to achieve in the usual period of undergraduate study.

Rationale for proposal

As we change 3rd-year Japanese course structure, we are retiring JPN 306 & 310. We have removed JPN 306 & 310 from BA in Japanese Language and Literature Concentration, East Asian Studies with Japanese Language Concentration and Double-Language.

Once our proposal of JPN 504 and 508 are accepted, these courses will be listed as 5-credit courses, and therefore there will be no change in the number of credit hours required for these majors.

Additional Information

Adding the new course, EALC 556: Chinese Studies to function as a capstone course for the East Asian Studies with concentration in Chinese track.

Program Description

Degree Requirements

Geology Programs

The B.A. program allows many free electives for background courses in the sciences or liberal arts. The program permits study of traditional geology (with emphasis on the solid earth, the earth's surface, or environmental geology and natural resources), environmental geology (with emphasis on water or urban environmental geology), or an individually tailored program.

Degree requirements may be altered to suit particular needs of a student upon petition to the undergraduate studies committee and in consultation with a geology faculty advisor. Special consideration is given to students with strong backgrounds in supporting sciences and students with superior records who decide to major in geology late in their programs.

First- and Second-Year Preparation

Students interested in geology should see a department advisor as soon as possible. They should enroll in mathematics, chemistry, and English in addition to Introduction to Geology and electives. Students should take GEOL 360 as soon as possible.

Advising

Developing a strong relationship with a faculty advisor helps students get the most out of their educational programs in the shortest time. Most courses for majors are offered in only one semester each year. Advisors can guide the student through complexities of the curriculum or into a specialized program.
