Rationale for Course Proposal The previous course description created confusion among students, faculty, and staff because it allowed people to satisfy the requirements after the enrolled semester, and it accepted both performance and crew options. This description eliminates the performance option and creates a 1:1 ratio for satisfying requirements within the enrolled semester.

Program Description

Law & Society is an interdisciplinary field that uses social-scientific and humanistic methods to understand how legal norms and structures shape our society, and how in turn society shapes these norms and structures. Students pursuing a bachelor's degree in Law & Society will develop strong critical thinking and written and oral communication skills while learning about law, legal norms, and legal institutions from social scientific and humanistic perspectives.

Courses in the major will examine legal policy, legal institutions, social movements, psychological attitudes and perceptions, managerial processes, social structures, and legal history, with a focus on the role of legal norms and structures in historical developments, current social and political processes, and comparative similarities and differences among societies.

Students with a degree in the field of Law & Society may pursue work in a variety of settings including criminal justice organizations (policing, corrections, probation, and judicial administration), non-profits and NGOs, policy think tanks, and political institutions.

The proposed Law & Society major is significantly different from the existing PUAD (Public Administration) major in its interdisciplinary background and core focus. PUAD is a disciplinary major that focuses on the implementation of policy and the administration of public agencies. By contrast, Law & Society is an interdisciplinary field that focuses on legal norms and institutions in a variety of contexts, ranging from the individual to the societal. Nonetheless the two fields overlap in some areas, particularly the study of how law influences public bureaucracies and governing processes.

A number of KU faculty already teach courses on law & society themes, and several of these faculty are in the School of Public Affairs and Administration. To supplement existing faculty, this proposal is supported by resources committed from the Edwards Campus for one tenure-track hire in the first year and a second in year three, and resources to hire lectures. Before additional tenure-track faculty members are fully in place, the major would rely on methods courses and electives from PUAD and other departments. After the new faculty members hired for the proposed program are in place, we anticipate a significant expansion in the number of electives offered specifically as part of the Law & Society major.

Additional Information

strength in interdisciplinary study, using social-scientific and humanistic methods to understand how legal norms and structures shape our society, and how in turn society shapes these norms and structures.

Students with a degree in this field will be prepared to enter the workforce in a variety of careers that include criminal justice organizations, non-profits, and political institutions.

As the only such undergraduate program offered by a public institution in the state of Kansas, this major in Law and Society would satisfy a primary criterion in the University's mission statement - to offer a unique curriculum of study to the people of Kansas. While there are existing programs in criminal justice, this interdisciplinary program focuses on a much wider area of study and provides a broader range of post-graduation opportunities.

And as an interdisciplinary program that takes advantage of courses, programs, and research projects across a broad spectrum of departments and units, such a major would also fit with KU's Planning for Excellence which emphasizes collaborative interdisciplinary research and teaching.

This program will require additional resources from the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, and funds have been set aside by the Edwards Campus in order to address these needs. Upon approval of this initial summary, the proposed major would go through the regular review process in the College.

Sincerely,
Don

Don Steeples, Interim Dean
College of Liberal Arts and Sciences
University of Kansas

A number of KU faculty already teach courses on law & society themes, and several of these faculty are in the School of Public Affairs and Administration. With the new Law and Society major approved, no additional resources are needed to support a minor in Law and Society. With the new faculty members for the proposed Law and Society BA/BGS, we anticipate a significant expansion in the number of electives offered specifically as part of the Law & Society minor.
